Not illustrated. 1892 Excerpt: .she had not understood, but which she knew had reference to her; of her father having asked her if she liked Count Silvaverde, and, on her replying, Oh yes, well enough! his telling her that marriage was a very serious thing, and she should not enter that state lightly. The speech had merely made Marietta yawn. She had looked upon marriage as a rather tiresome necessity belonging to the distant future, until her acquaintance with Herbert began. Then, when this handsome young Englishman betrayed his admiration for her, her heart had begun to flutter and beat, and the world of sentiment opened before her, for the first time. Herbert might have awakened a gentle passion in her, if his own passion had not been so strong that it frightened hers away. For once he had got beyond the region of flirtation; for the first time a fancy had deepened into love, and he, being deficient in selfcontrol, could not help betraying himself in a way which startled the timid girl. The letters agitated, moved her, but also filled her with fear and dismay. After receiving the third, she unbosomed herself to Lizzie. This she could only do in a whisper, for Mrs. White was always in the room. Tell him not to send any more, and not to speak to me until my father comes. I will! I will! whispered Lizzie back, and oh, I am sure it would be better. You re not working, girls,...
