Excerpt: . . . is, generally speaking, safe to assume that a low protein content and a high crude-fiber content give evidence of adulteration. The main materials which are used for adulterating ground corn and oats are oat hulls, oat dust, corn bran, ground corn cobs, hominy feed, etc. , all of which, except the last feed given, are high in crude fiber and low in protein. Of the 50 samples analyzed this year, five samples are considered suspicious from the fact that they contained more than 7 per cent, of crude fiber and one is either adulterated or of very low grade. Having a crude fiber content of more than 9 per cent. The results of analyses of ground corn and oats made this year indicate a marked improvement in the character of the ground corn and oats sold in the state over that obtained in earlier...
