Excerpt: .in through the gate of the Yoshiwara right into the full blaze of the garish lights streaming from the parti-coloured lanterns swinging at the doorways and from the cages. He dismounted, and strolled past the sake shops and tea-houses, and what he once called in the Chronicle gaily-bedizened bebies of frailty on exhibition, squatting, pipe in hand, in long rows behind their lacquer brazier--each house with its distinctive crest--with the whole entourage repeated in duplicate in the huge plate-glass mirrors that in most cases formed the panelling of the walls of the show-room. Through streets on streets of this description he fared, with their motley crowds of all nationalities and tongues and colours. English Jacks elbowed their way through throngs of pig-tailed Chinamen, here and there jabbering and chaffering and cheapening the wares the fox-visaged, bullet-headed gyu kept on crying and extolling and thrusting...
